HOUSE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

Mr. Chairman, Congressman Smith, and distinguished members of the Committee, I appreciate this opportunity to discuss this important issue with you today.

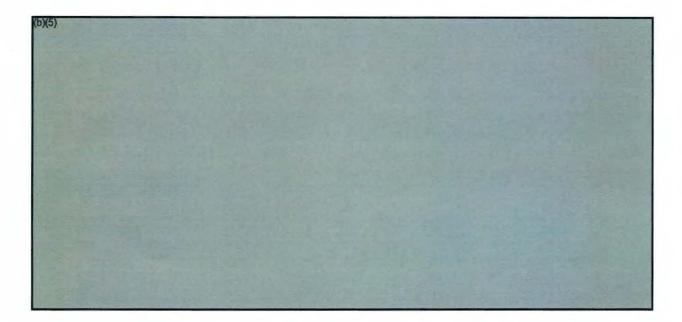

The simple truth is that leaks pose risks to our national security. As any battlefield commander will tell you, information is a valuable weapon. Intentionally leaking classified information reduces the options available to our decision-makers. It empowers our enemies. It tells them what we know and what we don't. It helps them fight smarter and resist longer. It strengthens their morale.

This is not only true in the abstract. Leaking classified information is a criminal act that endangers our most precious resource: the men and women who serve the nation in uniform. It increases the chances that they will be attacked, wounded or killed. It is a betrayal of their trust.

Leaking classified information has other consequences too. The fear that today's private advice could end up in tomorrow's news restricts dialogue among decision-makers. It erodes trust within the military and creates friction with other agencies and departments. It generates confusion on security standards which can lead to more leaks and lapses. It takes attention away from other important matters. In short, it harms the healthy functioning of government.

There must be accountability for those who leak classified information. All DOD employees—both military and civilian—undergo annual training to familiarize them with the proper procedures for safeguarding classified material. There are serious consequences for those who fail to uphold these obligations.

Let me make a distinction here: I am a strong advocate of disclosure. I am not advocating for more secrecy in military affairs. Rather, I am urging all of those who have access to classified information—both in uniform and out—to safeguard it properly.

In closing, the American people have bestowed upon us a sacred trust. The Service Chiefs and I are committed to ensuring that our Nation's service members are following the procedures we have in place for safeguarding classified information.

I look forward to your questions.
